History of the Pekin

Hum and Bessie Yow, the original proprietors of the Pekin Noodle Parlors, opened the Pekin Café And Lounge in 1911 with help of Tam Kwong Yee, grandfather of current owners Sharon and Ding K. Tam, or as the Butte locals refer to the mom and pop couple as The Wongs.

The Yows constructed the building in 1909 and operated a gaming parlor and markets on Butte's Historic Main Street. Two years later the Yows began serving noodles and developed its own Chinese American dish Chop Suey that was served to Butte's mining community.

The Pekin continues to serve Traditional cuisine including Cantonese and Szechwan dishes.

Story of Chop Suey and Chow Mein

“The Macao and Woosung” was the first Chinese restaurant on U.S. territory, and it was a hit with miners and inspired dozens of other Chinese immigrants to open restaurants, called “chow chows”.

Chop Suey, for example, got its start in 1850 when a bunch of hungry miners busted their way into a chow-chow late at night and demanded to be fed. The chef just stirred all the table scraps and leftovers he could find into a big mess and served it. The miners loved it. When asked what it was, the chef replied, “chop sui” which means “garbage bits” in Cantonese. The dish remained virtually unheard of in China until after World War II: Today, it's advertised as American cuisine.

Chow Mein was a mixture of noodles and vegetables, probably served to railroad crews in the 1850's and stems from a Mandarin dialect word meaning “fried noodles.” Egg Foo Yung is from a Guangdong word meaning “egg white” (translated literally Egg Foo Yung means “egg egg white”). Likewise, Won Ton soup, egg rolls, barbecued spareribs, and sweet-and-sour pork were all concocted to whet American appetites.

Cookbook

Pekin will be publishing a historical cookbook full of company history, recipes, stories and photographs.

There will be an inside look at all the businesses contained within the building including gaming, tobacco, medical herbs/tea, importing, and immigration.

Fun Fact

Fortune cookies were invented in 1916 by George Jung, a Los Angeles noodlemaker, who gave them to customers at his Hong Kong Noodle Company to distract them while they waited for their orders.
